JAMIE O'NEAL

Jamie O'Neal's gift is her passion for life and for music. She writes songs with heart and intelligence, delivering them with casual elegance in what one critic described as "a Ferrari of a voice." Exploding onto the country music scene with the devastating end-of-love song, "There Is No Arizona," she set a high standard for herself as both songwriter and singer. Her new album, Brave, more than builds on that promise, as O'Neal confirms her strengths as a singer's singer, but also makes impressive strides as a songwriter, co-writing nine of the record's 11 songs. Finding Nashville as her permanent home in 1996, Jamie lauded songs on albums by LeAnn Rimes and Chely Wright, and sang the demos for several titles that would become major hits for other artists, including Faith Hill's "This Kiss". Nashville also brought her first recording contract, first album and her husband, Rodney Good. O'Neal nabbed a pair of #1 hits, "There Is No Arizona" and "When I Think About Angels", each earned her Grammy nominations as a songwriter for "Country Song of the Year." In addition, "Arizona" brought a third Grammy nod for "Best Female Country Vocal Performance." The Academy of Country Music named her the Top New Female Vocalist, she sang on the soundtracks of Bridget Jones's Diary and When We Were Soldiers, appeared on the Grand Ole Opry, The Tonight Show with Jay Leno and The Late Show with David Letterman. She has toured with Reba McEntire, Martina McBride, Alan Jackson, Kenny Chesney and Toby Keith.
